The scholarship is dedicated to the study of innovative conservation methods for metal objects of archaeological origin, based on sustainable and green chemical formulations. The doctoral student will support the research already underway at the Center for Cultural Heritage Technology, initially dealing with understanding the degradation mechanisms involved and defining the main types of degradation on archaeological artefacts in bronze alloys from the Roman era, based on the characterization results obtained. The candidate will then mainly deal with formulating and developing suitable conservation methods through innovative/modern approaches, including the use of bio-derived organisms with a stabilizing and/or passivating action. The properties of the treatments tested on replica materials will be evaluated for application for conservation purposes on real archaeological materials.
